

Life Education Series: Let's slash

(PGSLE011920)

Introduction

In the modern capitalist society, corporates are having employees playing different roles. Under this pre-determined framework, most people define their own lifestyle. Slashers are just the opposite, they pursue their multiple passions through their diversified skills, thus they take back the autonomy to define their own work/life. With the global trend of gig economy, it is expected that more people would choose to become slashers. How could young people equip themselves to embrace this trend? Our guest, Ms Jackie Cheung, will share with us her life as a slasher, and the challenge she encounters in terms of her work and life planning.

Programme Type

Talk

Instructor

Ms Jackie Cheung

Jackie is a slasher with broad skills ranging from translation, copywriting, event management, video direction and marketing. After graduating from Cultural Studies Department of Lingnan University, Jackie has over 15 years of experience wandering through corporates, NGOs and social enterprises.

She had been a financial translator, then hopped to a sales role for corporate solutions for 7 years. With a growing urge to seek meaning in her job, she then joined Green Monday, in which her diverse skills were able to be utilized in a startup environment. In 2015, she realized that a single job can no longer satisfy her multiple passions, thus she left and started leading a slasher lifestyle.

Among her diverse job experiences, she's managed fundraising gala dinners, international academic conferences and running races; worked backstage in concert and fashion shows, etc. In 2019, she launched a movement "Slash Union" to promote and advocate for the unique lifestyle choice of slashing; in July, she curated a talk show on Apple Daily's video channel under the same name.
